Dunstan Hospital, 27th February, 1894.

It is contemplated to extend the ward accommodation of this hospital on a plan which, after some modifications, I approved. I found everything in good order, except that the ventilation openings in the ceiling of the wards required to be improved by tubes crowned by Boyle's ventilators or torpedoes. There is no other change of importance to report since my former visit.

Gisborne Hospital, 30th March, 1894.

A ward containing eight beds has been added to this hospital, at a cost of £400 for the building and £100 for the furnishing. A new wash-house and a new mortuary have also been erected. Miss Stewart (the matron) and her staff manage most admirably, and the medical work is most carefully attended to.
