EARL KITCHENER.

Where art thou sleeping now,
Where, in thy wandering bed?
What laurels wreath thy brow,
What pillow props thy head?

Nor cloak nor sculptured pile
Shall wrap thy warrior clay,
Nor vast cathedral aisle
O'er-arch the pilgrim-way.

Where England in her need
Might draw beside thy bier,
And say, "in very deed,
A Lionheart lies here!"

Give us, O stealthy wave,
Give us our stalwart son,
Give him who to us gave
The means of victory won;

That we may hold his dust,
Precious, and pure as fire,
In venerable trust,
To crown his soul's desire.

"Wherefore would ye complain?"
The Ocean makes reply:
"Have I no wide domain
Fit for the great who die?"

"Nor mantling mists to shroud,
Nor caves of awful gloom,
Nor continents of cloud
To span a hero's tomb?"

"Hear ye the writhing surge,
Hear ye, the tempest's roar!
Nor grief is there nor dirge
For him ye see no more.

"Grant him his boundless shrine,
Hear his swift fate bemoan;
What mortal was is mine,
His spirit be your own.

"And let your sons fulfil
His timely task, and make
A wider England still,
And worthier, for his sake.

"Yea, England, would ye praise?
Would ye his memory bless?
Add Freedom to your days,
And peace, and Righteousness.

"Suns soar above his grave,
And stars shine o'er his head;
The impulse of the brave
Dies not: be comforted."

Mother (to daughter who, instead of going to church, went for a walk with her young man): "What was the text this evening, dear?" Daughter: "Love one another."
