BROKEN RANKS.

(By Gerardy).

Far scattered are those ranks which war
has massed!

In single file, across the buffet floor,
Then ushered swiftly through its open door,

Survivors from the battle-front have passed

To face the welcome world; and they are parted,

Some worn and listless, other joyous-hearted.

Ah, they have gone their strange, unchallenged ways!

The men who made the pace—the staid and steady,

Whose aim was true, whose steel was ever ready

To hold a battered line for ghastly days.

The men who saddled up, and madly thundered

Down alien streets, whose reeking shops they plundered.

And there were some hard-doers long ago,

Who sent their pealing laughter down
the ranks,

Till every Digger giggled at their pranks,
And winter days withheld their tales of woe:

But these have not returned. Lips ripe for kissing

Turned not to welcome them—for they were missing.

They took abroad their mirth on crowded ships,

Agog with devilment, they headlong strode

To meet their fate beside the crippled lips.

In groaning wards we've often seen them lying,

Springing some first-rate jokes while they were dying.

They were the buttresses of their platoon,

The firm foundations of its fighting strength;

And when a bleeding comrade sprawled
full-length,

They served his last request. By star and moon,

From dawn till dusk their lives were nobly given.

Far scattered are those ranks which war
has riven!
