Two Kinds of War + Industrial and International Troubles Coercion or Conciliation? + Bill Through House Statement on Defence

TWO kinds of war attracted the attention of the House during the week. While the Hon. P. C. Webb was securing authority for cutting recalcitrant unions out of the system of conciliation and arbitration, the Hon. F. Jones was preparing his statement of the Government's argument if conciliation and arbitration failed in the wider field of international troubles. The Opposition made only formal criticisms of the first, and demanded compulsory military training for the second.

Quick Results

The purpose of the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Amendment Act was obvious on the day after it was passed,

Spencer Digby photograph
HON. P. C. WEBB, introduced a new industrial Bill when the Gazette contained a notice to the effect that the union registration of the Otahuhu Chemical Manure Workers had been cancelled. Mr. Webb explained its general purpose in plain terms. "If unions want the protection of the Arbitration Court they will have to comply with its conditions," he said. "At the present time, if the men strike the employer cannot employ other labour; but if a union is deregistered the employers will be able to take on whom they like."

The Other War

The Hon. F. Jones discussed another kind of war. His subject, Defence, attracted more interest in the House even than the discussion of financial matters heard earlier in the Address-in-Reply debate. Although the Hon. Mr. Nash broke into the news from London during the week with his financial agreement in England, it was Mr. Jones, on the Home Front, who got the biggest headlines.

Some Figures

In a few cases Mr. Jones mentioned specific criticisms of the Government's defence programme, but in the main he dealt with the points raised in earlier debates by giving a full outline of everything that had been done and as much as seemed advisable of what was still to be done. He compared the 1938-39 cost of maintaining the army, £706,753, with the lowest figure in the last 12 years, £156,311 in 1931-32; and gave other statistics showing the decline until that year and the increase since. Details of expenditure on air defence came to a total of about £4,500,000. New Zealand's contribution to the Royal Air Force, he said, would shortly bring the number of locally trained candidates sent to England up to 369. When the training scheme was in full operation 220 pilots would be sent away every year, and the British Government had now increased the payment per head to £1,700, which meant that the annual total would be about £374,000. In addition, the New Zealand Division of the Royal Navy would cost £1,173,000 and £3,557,000 for capital and maintenance expenditure respectively during the five-year period 1936-41.

Compulsion?

The Opposition contended that provision for defence was inadequate. If their viewpoint had not been clear before it was certainly made clear during the debate that the Opposition stood for compulsory military training. While they did not wish to appear luke-warm in their support of defence measures, they would not agree that safety was possible without universal and therefore compulsory service.

Pit Boy to Speaker

The Hon. Mark Fagan, once a pit boy in Tasmanian tin mines, was elected Speaker of the Legislative Council during the week. He had been

Leader of the Council since the Labour Government came into office, and was the first Leader to be made Speaker. His successor, the Hon. D. Wilson, was well received when he took Mr. Fagan's place.
