"The Listener" Interviews A Bishop

As English as Christchurch

"UNLESS we abolish war we will wipe ourselves out. . . I am trying to see how human life can be most effectively illumined by the Christian faith. Without that faith I do not see how we can keep civilisation. . . The great problem to-day is the problem of total war. If war is going to be between whole nations, I cannot see how we can draw lines as to what can and what cannot be used in war. There are no Marquess of Queensberry rules."

The Rt. Rev. John P. Moyes, Bishop of Armidale, New South Wales, who was in Wellington the other day, made these observations to a staff reporter of The Listener in an interview. He was on his way to give one of the addresses at Christ's College, Christchurch, where a conference of the National Council of Churches was being held.

One of his reasons for coming to New Zealand, the Bishop told us, was to acquire all the information he could about the New Zealand Christian campaign. "We have not a national council of churches in Australia, but we hope to set one up in the next few months," he said.

The Bishop is no stranger to the Dominion. He visited Christchurch in 1939 as Diocesan Missioner. In 1943 he went to America as one of the two Australian delegates to the Princeton Conference of the Federal Council of Churches held to consider the Basis of a Just and Durable Peace. While there he met Dean Warren, of Christchurch.

We had heard that Armidale, half-way between Sydney and Brisbane, with its 10,000 people, considered itself as English as Christchurch, New Zealand, does. It claims an English climate. But its chief fame is educational. It has a university college which, within a few years, the Bishop expects, will have its own charter as an independent university. At present it has 250 students, but this number will probably double itself in two years. Then Armidale will be what some now call it, the Cambridge of Australia.

Bishop Moyes is keenly interested in education, and is proud of the fact that Armidale has a teachers' training college with 400 students, while two large boarding schools connected with the Church of England have 480 students between them. All of these, except 20, are boarders. The Catholic Church conducts a big secondary school for boys, the Presbyterian Church has a secondary school, and there is a State high school drawing its pupils largely from the north of New South Wales. All told there are 1800 young people in secondary education in Armidale. Three primary schools have an attendance of 1500 children, and so there is the unusual proportion of more than 3000 students at school out of a total population of 10,000.

Though sociology, psychology, and theology make up most of the Bishop's reading, he has time to interest himself in the progress and welfare of his city and district. Armidale, he says, is a very

HOME AND LEISURE

A SPELL of really fine weather in Wellington recently, with its prevision of Spring, caused three city businessmen to realise that they were not so busy after all. A three-corner conversation overheard by one of our representatives went like this:

Mr. A.—I think I'll get away from the office at 12 to-day and do a bit of pruning.

Mr. B.—Jolly good idea; I took yesterday afternoon off for a spot of spring planting.

Mr. C.—My staff will probably be able to get along without me to-morrow, and if it's like to-day, I'll tidy up the rock garden.

"Our Homes and Our Leisure" is the general title of the last of the series of Winter Course talks, from 4YA, and should be of special interest to listeners who are able, as the three businessmen apparently are, to dovetail the two so pleasantly. But the talks will interest a great many more, for after all, home and leisure had a strong link with what VJ Day was all about.

The first talk in this series, on "Electronics To-day and To-morrow," by J. S. Coombs, M.Sc., Lecturer in Physics, Otago University, was given this Tuesday (September 4). The remaining talks will be: Tuesday, September 11, "Design for Leisure," by Miss J. T. MacLennan, who will speak on recreations in the home, ancient and modern; September 18, "House or Home" by Eric Miller, A.R.I.B.A.; September 25, "Fashion, the Fantastic Industry," by Mrs. E. Macnee, of the Otago University Library; and October 2, "Fashion or Function in Furniture," by Mrs. M. Harris.
