Society in Melbourne), Mrs. A. Fairbairn (an artist), and Mrs. I. Hunter (president of the Lawson and Gordon Memorial Societies).

"We want to form a liaison with New Zealand," said Mr. Ingamells, "not exercising any sort of control, but on a reciprocal basis. We would like somebody here take an interest in the movement, for we believe the two countries should assist each other, forming a link of cultural endeavour."

"Ho do you think New Zealand should go about it?"

"Well, you could get a body of citizens to gather material relating to local literature and history and form a central committee. Such archives would be of great benefit to New Zealand and to Australia, while our own archives would always be available to you. We're not isolationists; we want our two countries to get together. In fact, a movement of this sort might be a very good thing if it embraced all English-speaking countries."

It seems, indeed, that there is considerable ignorance in Australia about New Zealand. Mr. Ingamells confessed that he had known little about us till he came here. When it was suggested that he should visit New Zealand, he was asked how long he thought it would take to complete his mission, and he guessed at about six weeks. So arrangements were made for him to be away for just that time. But when he discovered the size of the main cities and the number of inland towns (Australia does not possess anything like the same proportion) he soon realised that he could touch only the fringe of the job. His trip so far, he said, has resulted only in scratching the surface, so he hopes to return here next year.

Mr. Ingamells is calling on the Universities, schools and education boards in the centres, explaining the objects of his association and seeking their interest and co-operation.

It was won by a Hastings team, on their home ground.
