

NO one goes hungry in New Zealand now.

No breadwinner lacks a job—nor any family an income.

On the contrary, New Zealand homes have never before enjoyed such a high tide of prosperity.

Wages are higher and hours shorter. Work is abundant. Production on farm and in factory sets new records. The people's savings are greater than they have ever been. There is plenty of the good things in life for everyone—and everyone has the money to buy them.

More people own their own homes than ever before. More houses are being built than ever — both by the Labour

Government and the private builder, frequently assisted by State-provided finance.

There's security for all—even in sickness or widowhood or old age.

Labour's Social Security plan is a model for the world to copy from, lifting financial burdens and hardships from the shoulders of the less fortunate.

These are the things that make New Zealand the world's best place to live in. These are the things that Labour planned—and then brought into being. Let's keep it that way. Don't gamble with our prosperity.
