

I SHOOK LIKE A LEAF when they asked me to speak

Today I can sweep them off their feet

"I knew I had to give that report to the Directors. I had prepared for weeks . . . had it word perfect . . . but when they called my name my brain just froze. All eyes seemed glued on me. I stood in dumb agony, mumbled a few rambling words, left out the most important facts, then slumped into my seat. This had been my big chance to impress these men, to show them I had brains and ability. And I had failed miserably." "Then it was Kennedy, the other buyer's turn. He spoke confidently, clearly and, with an unusual turn of phrase, seemed to electrify the room. I knew his figures weren't as good as mine, and he hadn't the suggestions to make, but when he sat down, he was greeted by a round of applause. 'The next day, Kennedy came over to me: 'Clive,' he said, 'I know what's the matter with you. You could have said much more at the conference, but you were scared. Four months ago, I was like you. I couldn't even talk intelligently to a few people, let alone to a meeting.' Then he told me his secret . . . and to-day I laugh at the memory of that dreadful experience. To-day, I have the power to hold an audience of one or a hundred. I am no longer self-conscious. I have talked before the same men who witnessed my embarrassment, and to-day they are amazed at my eloquence. Promotion has come—more than I had dared hope for, for now I can express myself unfettered by fear and confusion."
