SHEPHERD'S CALENDAR

Pursuit of Unhappiness KNOW that there are men by "SUNDOWNER" and women who have never been homesick, as there are birds and beasts that are as happy in one environment as in another. But they are not common. Though I thought when I was very young that homesickness was a human complaint only ("How can ye chant. ye little birds, and I so weary, fu' of care?") I am sure now that animals feel most of the pains their owners feel, but feel them less intensely, and for shorter periods. The chief advantage they

OCTOBER 1 have over us, if the test is one of feeling only, is that they do not anticipate their troubles. A man going to war, a boy going to sea, a girl leaving home for a boarding school, knows that misery is coming. An animal knows nothing till it does come.

It surprised me all the same when I sent Betty away recently, separating her from a six-months-old calf, from Elsie who had been her companion for six years, and from the only home paddock she had ever known, that she had forgotten everything in three days. It was no doubt a help that she went from scarcity to abundance, but her shallow brain helped most. She forgot because she had no capacity to remember, none to see the shadow before separation came, and none to retain it when it began to lift. If she had been a cat or a horse or a dog the experience would have been more bitter, and the bitterness of longer duration, but it would not have risen to the human level even if she had been an elephant, I have known a dog resist change for six months, but he was not miserable all those months: he was uneasy, and if left to himself he would set off after an hour or two for the farm, several miles away, from which he had been bought. But he forgot at last and spent the second half of his life very happily with a new owner. Elephants, we are told, never forget, but that, I am sure,
