VICTORIAN JUKE-BOX

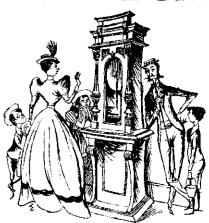

THE Polyphon leaned back forlornly into its dark corner on the New Brighton pier. Reverently we approached it and gazed into its mute face. We slipped our offering, a penny, into the slot in its massive oaken side. We waited.

Seconds of suspense. A feeble creak, then the faint whirring of old, tired, trembling wheels. Time ticked back a cog. Back almost a whole century. Into our faded city ears stole the quiet dignified tones of an old organ.

Trams, wireless, milk shake machines, ice-cream-sucking children faded into background like a film sequence. The Polyphon played on. Generously it gave us a little thing from The Geisha called "Star of My Soul," not once, but three times for the same penny.

"He's got a bit cranky these days," said the lady who worked the turnstile on to the pier. "Won't stop when he's started. They have to poke his insides."

She had white hair, spectacles, a smile. Said the Polyphon had always been there. Once, right out in the sunlight in the passage-way where everyone passed. Now a little rustier, with
