The Children's Crusade has been most successful, partly because of the appealing nature of the legend and the music, and partly because of the attraction of the large chorus of children. The children's chorus in this performance numbered 600, two hundred of them off-stage. An extract from a medieval chronicle serves as preface to the score: About that time many children, without leader and without guidance, did fly in a religious ecstasy from our towns and from our cities, making for the lands beyond the seas. And to those who asked of them whither they were bound, they did make answer, "To Jerusalem, in search of the Holy Land." They carried staves and satchels, and crosses were embroidered on their garments; and many of them came from beyond Cologne. They travelled to Genoa and did embark upon seven great vessels to cross the sea. And a storm arose and two vessels perished in the waters. And to those who asked of such of the children as were saved, the reason of the journey, these replied, "We do not know." The poet added dramatic interest, intensity of religious feeling and some small degree of characterisation to this stark outline: the composer contrived contrasting scenes of pastoral beauty, mystical ecstasy, childlike innocence, the terrors of the storm, the final victory in death. The music is pervaded by a sort of impressionistic medievalism.
