(Repeat of last Monday's broadcast)
7.35 Vitya Arousky and Victor Bablin (piano-plants)
Concerto for Two Solo Pianos

Stravinsky's Concerto for Two Pianos, written in 1935, has a number of remarkable features. Not the least of them is the fact that in no sense is one of the pianos a solo instrument and the other an accompanying factor, such as the orchestra may be said to be in the 19th Century concerto.

The music for both instruments is of equal importance; the music is inextricably interlocked throughout; there are passages where the musical ideas, as printed, run across the page from one piano part directly into the other as though for some incredible four-handed virtuoso. The music is vigorously pianistic, emphasising the percussive rather than the legato qualities of the instrument.
