

Recently the canons of the cathedral of Paderborn received an order from the German authorities to forthwith assemble in the chapter house, and elect another bishop in lieu of the deposed prelate. Not one of the reverend gentlemen obeyed, and in consequence of their courageous abstention, several of them have been fined and imprisoned. The courage of the clergy in Germany is truly wonderful and worthy of the high praise lavished upon it by our Holy Father.

"And they hate kings?" Garibaldi, that king hater in chief, recently bought a pair of boots at the shop of a noted Republican, or, better, Internationalist, of Rome. This person has since put up over his door—"Bootmaker by appointment to General Garibaldi," and this with the special permission of the democratic hero. Our readers are aware that in monarchical countries the furnishers of the Court receive the right of announcing on their sign boards that they are furnishers to the king or queen. Still Garibaldi after all is a kind of sovereign. He rules over the evil passions of the people.

The trial for the murder of Sonzogno, the editor of the Roman 'Capitale,' continues actively, and discloses some very shocking details concerning the domestic life of that unhappy man. While he was ever railing against the clergy and persons in authority, he was himself, it appears, guilty of gross immorality, which no doubt led finally to his assassination, as he is credited with having destroyed the domestic happiness of one of his friends by perverting his wife. He was an apostle of the revolution, and appears to have practised what he preached.

A lady publishes in one of the Roman papers the following extract from a letter received from a nun, who is in one of the semi-suppressed convents of Rome: "We have nothing in the house, not even bread. For God's sake help us, for we are literally starving. The government does not pay us our pensions, and we have neither money nor food, and are obliged to beg for our living, as we have neither work to sell nor means to buy materials to work with."
