THE HOME-RULE OUTLOOK.

HERE is something not only encouraging but positively exhilarating and inspiring in the present position of the great national movement in Ireland. As he sees the splendid unity, the glowing enthusiasm, the immense ability, and the 'unconquered and unconquerable' courage with which the movement is now being directed, the lover of Ireland feels himself strangely stirred. His first emotion is a feeling of thankfulness that is almost too deep for words; then long pent-up hopes break forth, and he feels his blood move faster and his heart beat quicker at the prospect—the by no means remote prospect—of success at last for the grand old cause. For never since the death of PARNELL has the outlook for Ireland been so hopeful as it is to-day. Under the magic unifying influence of the United Irish League—the happy inspiration of Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN—the deplorable divisions of the past have been healed, the party are able to present in the Parliamentary battles a solid and united front, and they are now being led by Mr. REDMOND with a skill and masterfulness that have exceeded the anticipations of even his most sanguine friends. In these circumstances, it is not surprising that the old national spirit—which slumbered indeed, but was never really dead—has been quickened into fresh life, and a great wave of sympathy and enthusiasm is sweeping over every country under the sun where the sea-divided Gael has made his home. In America, in answer to the impassioned appeals of Messrs. W. REDMOND and DEVLIN, the whole country is ablaze, and the ebullition evoked by their mission is without a parallel even in the early days of the Land League. In Australia the Irishmen have, as usual, risen to the occasion, and the meetings which have been already held in Sydney and Melbourne give evidence of unbounded enthusiasm. In New Zealand, too, the hearts of Irishmen beat high with hope and joy, and though the geographical circumstances of the Colony render a grand united demonstration impracticable, the Irish organisations in the various centres will assuredly join in the great colonial protest against the Coercion curse, and will do their part to help the cause in every possible and practical way.

In addition to the added strength and influence gained by the long-desired restoration of unity amongst the Irish Party, there are other special circumstances which have contributed to make the Irish question assume a position of more than usual importance, and which make a general colonial expression of opinion specially valuable and appropriate at the present time. The first of these is the course which events have taken in South Africa from the beginning to the end of the late war. It is admitted on all hands that in that struggle the Irish soldiers behaved with a dash and gallantry that were simply brilliant, and the part they played and the sacrifices they made give Ireland a special claim to a just, to say nothing of a generous, treatment at
