

British Engines First.

American exports of locomotives during 1904 were very nearly equal to those of the United Kingdom, says a trade report just issued.

British engines still hold their own largely in India, South Africa, Australasia, and Argentina. The capital which built the lines in these countries and which in most cases still controls them, is British "and, of course, intensely interested in British rolling stock."

On the other hand, American locomotives are largely exported to Canada.
