

Should You Think About Films?

place have fostered and advanced the arts and crafts of civilisation. Easily overcoming resistance in their monster planes (a point at which the picture reaches some of its greatest heights of awe-inspiring spectacle), they form a new international order, pledged to collective security, peace and progress.

On to the year 2036—a century from now. Here the film is most truly in the realms of pure imagination; but it is imagination rooted in reality, growing from things as we now know them to things as they conceivably might become—television, smokeless, dirt-free cities, universal air transport, and a thousand other possible wonders, including the Great Space Gun, in which man, having conquered the Earth, sets out to conquer the Universe. For that is the concluding Wellsian message—that life must go forward or slip backward; that human progress and happiness, not the futile waste of war, is the only true excuse for human suffering.
