At the last moment, we have news from Taranaki, by the Tasmanian Maid, of a very

Gold, at Mahoetahi, was, however, satisfied that the pah remained intact. He doubted whether any movement had taken place; evidently a flag, not the red, white, and blue, was floating on the pah.

The River Waiongona was pretty full, but not so full but that a native carried one of the officers of the Naval Brigade across on his back. I have good reason to believe that no one except Colonel Gold was satisfied to assume that all was quiet. Every whole fierce and energetic mind is bent on aiding our cause. His absence, however, left the rear party without a guide, and possibly was in part the reason of the loss by this rearward division. Lieutenant Brooke was killed in a swamp, fighting several natives with his sword, till a cut on the wrist disabled him and he fell by the blows of their tomahawks. The rearward party left thirteen men on the ground; only one wounded man escaped; the whole retreat having to be hardly fought.
